Bob Dylan enjoyed listening to the radio when he was a little child. After he went to senior high school, he formed a band with his friends and practiced singing when they had free time. Bob finished his studies in senior high school in 1959. He soon found interest in folk music and often sang folk songs at night clubs then.

Though he didn't finish his studies in college, his love for folk music never changed. In 1961, he went to New York to visit his favorite singer, Woody Guthrie, and sang in front of him. Then he had some chances to sing at some large clubs and soon became popular around America. He usually wrote songs himself and showed his ideas about the world in his works. By listening to his works carefully, fans were able to learn the way to love and treat other people.

Bob Dylan is seventy-eight years old now, but he never stops writing songs. He isn't as popular as he was in the 1960s. In 2016, Bob Dylan won Nobel Prize in Literature. It may be strange for a singer to win that, but the fact also tells us one thing: Bob Dylan is not just a singer, he is also a writer and thinker.
